In recognition of Mental Health Month, Brook Lane Presents

Creative Ways to Incorporate Music in the Therapeutic Process

Thursday, May 10, 2018

8:30 am -11:45 am (8:00 am Check-in & Continental Breakfast)

This program is funded in part by the William B. and Sylvia A. Hunsberger Fund

Listening to music can provide a relaxing effect on the mind and body and a positive influence on our physiological functioning. This training will include a synopsis of music therapy and how music impacts humans on neurophysiological, emotional, and social levels. Participants will be introduced to several music therapy principles and music interventions geared towards addressing non-musical goals with people with mental illness. Ethics regarding scope of practice will also be discussed. Participants will end the training with an experiential component on using music for relaxation and self-care.

At the conclusion, attendees should be able to:

- Define music therapy;
- Identify how music impacts humans neurophysiologically, emotionally and socially;
- Implement select music interventions and identify possible modifications and applications for their specific patients;
- Identify ethics related to implementing music interventions within specific scopes of practice;
- Use music effectively in patient relaxation and therapist self-care regimens.

Featuring: Bronwen Landless, MMT, MT-BC, is a board certified music therapist with over thirteen years of experience in the field of music therapy in mental health, with expertise in trauma-informed care and community building through music. She started a music therapy program from scratch at a psychiatric residential treatment facility for children and adolescents, and successfully ran and grew the program for eleven years. Over the last seven years, she has supervised music therapy students at both practicum and internship levels. As an adjunct professor at Shenandoah University since 2014, Bronwen has played a role in teaching, clinical supervision, course development, and program evaluation. She has presented nationally and internationally both at conferences and continuing education trainings. Bronwen is a Ph.D. candidate in Creative Arts Therapies at Drexel University. Her current research focus is on the possible impacts of music therapy on people who are homeless and their surrounding communities.
