The clinician-client relationship is a unique characteristic of the profession of mental health counseling and an integral component in treatment. Despite the importance of this relationship it presents complexities and challenges for the practicing mental health professional. This session will explore the complex, ever-changing dynamics clinicians experience in their relationships with clients. Discussion will include responding to ethical and boundary dilemmas, confidentiality, informed consent and mandated reporting laws.

At the conclusion, attendees should be able to:

- Discuss the complex legal and ethical dynamics of the clinician-client relationship;
- Review the concept & therapeutic benefit of professional boundaries;
- Differentiate between boundary crossings and violations;
- Discuss professional literature that argues professional boundary crossings can be therapeutic or should be avoided whenever possible;
- Differentiate boundary crossings from boundary violations;
- Discuss examples of boundary violations that have resulted in professional discipline;
- Summarize best practices when contacted by credentialing boards;
- Develop strategies to manage ethical dilemmas in the clinician-client relationship to protect client rights and minimize clinician risk.
